LOOKING AWAY

*'Looking Away is as radical, shocking and important as a book can be.
The comfortable, cowardly path is to turn away.
The brave path is to read, and to recognise the reality.'*

This feeble blemished light, this dawn mangled by night, this is not the morning we had all so longed for... - Faiz Ahmed Faiz

In the two decades since the early 1990s, when India confirmed its allegiance to the Free Market, more of its citizens have become marginalized than ever before, and society has become more sharply riven than ever.

In 'Looking Away', Harsh Mander ranges wide to record and analyse the many different fault lines which crisscross Indian society today.

There is increasing prosperity among the middle classes, but also a corresponding intolerance for the less fortunate. Poverty and homelessness are also on the rise-both in urban and rural settings- but not only has the state abandoned its responsibility to provide for those afflicted, the middle class, too, now avoids even the basic impulses of sharing. And with the sharp Rightward turn in politics, minority communities are under serious threat-their very status as citizens in question-as a belligerent, monolithic idea of the nation takes the place of an inclusive, tolerant one.

However, as Harsh Mander points out, what most stains society today is the erosion in the imperative for sympathy, both at the state and individual levels, a crumbling that is principally at the base of the vast inequities which afflict India. Exhaustive in its scope, impassioned in its arguments, and rigorous in its scholarship, 'Looking Away' is a sobering checklist of all the things we must collectively get right if India is to become the country that was promised, in equal measure, to all its citizens.

Valuable resource on current India

By Dr R Srinivsa Murthy

Excellent review of the inequalities in the current India. However, the third section of offering solutions is weak in that it is anecdotal and illustrative. It would have been very valuable if the solutions were offered at different levels of the society from the individual, family, local community, religion, state, nation as well as including the time frame for changes along with the needed resources for correcting the inequalities. Important contribution to the understanding the current India.
